when a Merino is well fed, and deposits the larger share of its surplus nutriment upon the skin, in the form of a heavy, beautiful fleece, full of yolk, it is not surprising that it should not at the same time produce the same juicy meat as the Southdown. If there were no difference in the quality of the meat it would still be evident that Merinos are not adapted for the production of mutton in comparison with the so-called mutton breeds. The larger size, better form, and more rapid growth will make the fat lamb from a Leicester or Cottswold ewe, either of which give an abundance of rich milk, twice as heavy, if not otherwise more decirable than a lamb abundance of rich milk, twice as heavy, if not otherwise more desirable than a lamb of the same sage from a Merino ewe. The shearling wethers from a good Leicester flock will weigh from 120 to 200 pounds, and the two shears from 200 to 280 pounds, while Cottawolds and Lincolns weigh still more. The earlier maturally of most mutton breeds, if nothing were claimed on the score of quality, would sufficiently power their superiority for the production of mutton. Down sheep, which have the reputation of affording mutton of superior quality, are some of them considerably interior to Leicesters in size, while Oxfordshire and Shropshire Downs are as heavy as Leicesters, and in great repute as producers of gion, and of the soil uppn which the sheep are to be kept. Many years since, after aking my medical degree in the city of New York, I spent some time abroad, mostly in Great Britain and France. While in England I was surprised to see so many distinct breeds of cattle and sheep in so small a country. Seeking an expla-nation, I noticed that in every instance a different geological formation, and con-sequently a different soil. Running diag-country through almost the center of Eng-land, from southwest to northeast, there is a beit of country where the rock is known as lias and colite. The soil upon these for-mations is well adapted for pasture, and mations is well adapted for pasture, and upon this stretch of land were almost all the long wool sheep of the country—Cottswolds, Leicesters and Lincoln; even one or two detached sections of similar soil, in other parts of the country also had similar sheep. To the southeast of the colite is the creta-To the southeast of the colite is the cretaceous formation, where the soil is thin and the herbaye much less luxuriant; every sheep that I saw upon this section was a down—Southdowns, Hampahiredowns and Oxfordshiredowns. The Shropshiredowns were not in this section, but ever the western side of the lias upon the red sandstone. On the mountains of Wales was a distinct breed; so, also, upon the Cheviot hills to the north of England, and still another breed; the black-faced or heath breed, on the mountains of Scotland.

A year or two since I was speaking of this relation between the geology of a country relation between the geology of a country and its animal forms to Professor Brown of the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph, when he showed me a volume he had writ-and the Ontario Agricoltural College at Guelph, when he showed me a volume he had written upon the subject, containing maps and charts for illustration. He had pursed the matter further than I had done, and was able to give me many new and interesting facts.

So long as adequate commercial protection enables the Ohio flock master to grow the best class of clothing wools at a fair profit, he will doubtless prefer some style of a Merino sheep. If the best wools can no longer be produced here at a reasonable profit, it may become necessary to grow those of coarser character, such as we usually find upon mutton sheep. Coarse wool fabrics appear to be more generally worn than lormally, and the regulation black broadcloth suit is no longer the invariable and necessary, mark of a gentleman. In order to utilize much of the surface of Ohio which is better adapted to sheep and wool growing shan-to-say other industry we must continue to keep abeep, selecting whatever variety is best adapted to the locality, and pays best. Except, perhaps, when dairying is made a specialty, sheep of some kind should be kept on nearly every farm in the Siate. Sheep are cheap feeder; they will pick up a good living for a time in a stubble field, saving feed that they for the proper surface in the spring. Two or three farmers in a neighborhood by alternately killing and dividing a good sheep can keep their tamilles supplied with fresh met both summer and winter.

Where a Transcript. cent, and of several per cent. Where a flock of sheep is unhealthy, it should prob-ably be attributed to unskillful manage-ment to a fullure to recognige and arrest parasitic diseases at their outset, or from failure to give sheep pastures a good dress-ing of land pluster occasionally to supply ing of land plaster occasionally to supply the sulphur which is indispensable to the formation of wool.
